D.J. Williams and Ellen Kominars EZ-Groom Corp., Oak Park, MI. U.S.A.

Conditioning agents reduce grooming effort and time by reducing tangles and surface tension of water. While many groomers view condition agents as an added step, the payback in less time and effort is there.

Drying pet hair requires more time than human hair because there is so much more of it. Showing consideration for hair density and diameter a typical golden retriever has twenty times the surface area of hair than does a person with a nominal length of 10" hair. Cats have three times higher hair density than dogs.

The grooming procedures that can be improved the most with well formulated liquid products are the combing / brushing process and the drying process. It is also possible to shorten the scissoring time by imparting texture to a coat.

The products discussed in this writing speed up the grooming process and fall into the general category of conditioning agents. A conditioner is defined as a product that improves the quality of hair surface to which it is applied particularly if this improvement involves the correction or prevention of surface damage. The cuticle structure is often damaged in the brushing and combing process from mechanical abrasion and stretching. structure can cause mats to form shortly after combing. Brushing matted coats is a stressful process that creates a great deal of coat damage that needs to be subsequently repaired with the use of an appropriate conditioner. Stressful because of the physical effort coupled with the extended time (up to several hours) with the knowledge that the laborious process itself, while improving appearance, is causing additional damage to the hair.

Matting is often caused by raised cuticles that ratchet with adjacent hair shafts. The cuticle structure can be visualized as a set of nested foam cups or the layers of shingles of a roof. Causing the cuticle structure to lie flat on the hair shaft will result in easier combing through the coat. While grooming tool designers have developed hand held combs and rakes that help with grooming matted coats, it is still difficult to work through hundreds of strands of tightly interwoven mats that in some cases have actually become spherically shaped clumps. Matting can also be caused by the accumulation of sebum on the hair which attracts debris and causes the hair shafts to bind together. Certain products are available to improve slip between hair strands with quaterniums that smooth and coat the individual strands. Such spray on detangle dematting products can be used before and after the bathing process.

The speed control board controls the rotation speed of the blower motor. This is done with an electronic device called a Triac. This device, in a variable resistance circuit acts just like a dimmer for lights in a home. This circuit, based on resistance (affected with the speed potentiometer) allows voltage and current flow only on for a portion of the 50/60 Hertz power cycle. The speed control potentiometer controls the point in each cycle that the triac is triggered on. With the speed control turned all the way up the triac is turned on at the beginning of each cycle. As the speed control is turned down, the trigger point is delayed more and more. This reduces the average power fed to the motor and thus reduces speed.

It easier to bath and comb the coat afterwards. However if the coat is badly matted, which is often the case, combing the coat will be a difficult and time consuming process. Most groomers prefer a comb for this process and work from the bottom up on the coat while working from the outside in. Working from the top down only adds to the mats. Working from inside out will only tighten the mats or pull the hair out. A spray on detangling product is used with Combing and brushing prior to the bathing process. This liquid functions best with a minimal application to the coat since excessive application will wet the coat and make combing and brushing difficult. Such products, if well formulated, also contain conditioning agents that repair much of the damage caused by brushing.

During the Bath: Matting caused by the accumulation of sebum on the hair which attracts debris and causes the hair shafts to bind together can be relieved by a good shampooing process. While bathing is done to remove sebum and debris deposited on the coat it is possible to take advantage of this grooming step by incorporating a conditioner with the shampoo base. Shampoos may include additives that dramatically reduce combing and brushing time. So much that in some cases, tangles and mats can be blown out with a high velocity dryer in seconds rather than literally up to hours of combing and brushing. In the absence of detangling ingredients, as with most common pet shampoos, one can use additives. One of the additives that are available for shampoo is a concentrated liquid that converts the shampoo to a de-matting product. With products of this type, only a one or two ounces of the concentrated solution needs to be added. When the mats are eliminated the grooming time required is reduced significantly. In the bathing process while the cleansing surfactants solubilize the oily sebum the additive deposits a thin layer of a conditioning agent on the hair shaft which results in easy combing through the mats.

After the Bath: While a number of shampoos have printed label claims of "fast drying" many fail to include ingredients that produce this outcome. Ingredients that will assist in fast drying include cosmetic grade silicone derivatives and other conditioning agents. These additives form a barrier on the cuticle that repels the water beads on each hair shaft. Fast drying shampoos are formulated to accelerate the drying process after shampooing.

The drying process is a two step procedure. In the first step the bulk of the water is mechanically removed from the coat. This can be visualized as the star-burst pattern generated as a dog emerges from a "dunk" in the lake and shakes to remove the mass of excess water on the coat. In this same way (mechanically removing the water) the bulk of the water is effectively removed from a coat with a high velocity dryer. Air flow forces water beads to roll off the coat. Towels also help to mechanically remove excess moisture. The second phase of the drying process is the evaporation process. It is possible to accelerate both the mechanical removal and evaporation processes by getting the water to sheet on the hair shaft.

The sheeting is accomplished by reducing the surface tension of water remaining in the coat. By sheeting there is a reduction in the height of the pool of water and increase the surface area it covers. It is not hard to visualize that when the thickness of the layer of water is reduced the evaporation process will be shorter. The process can be visualized using several examples. Water droplets on a kitchen counter tend to collect as raised pools of liquid. When a cloth is used to wipe the counter the water is "smeared" on the counter reducing the height of the liquid on the counter and allowing it to dry quicker. Sheetting is also produced from sheeting agents like Jet Dry, a product used in dishwashers to prevent the formation of water spots on glassware. Another example is, drying hands in public bath rooms that are equipped with a forced air dryer. In order to accelerate the drying process it is necessary to rub the hands together in order to reduce the thickness of the water layer on the skin thereby accelerating the drying process. Such "spray on – leave in" products have been proven to reduce blow dry time by as much as 50%. Some large volume pet grooming shop owners mandate that their bathers use such products for the purpose of reducing blow dry time.

After the Groom: Another liquid that reduces grooming time is known as waterless shampoo. These products are dispensed as foam. The attractive benefit of this product is that it can be applied to small areas which need the cleaning. Washing small spots instead of having to bath the entire coat will save the groomer time. This is particularly true when a dog soils itself prior to being released to its owner. With waterless shampoo it is possible to wash only the affected area and not the entire coat. When choosing products that will save time it is always good to experiment with conditioners as they will impart many benefits to the coat not the least of which are improved wet and dry combing.

Crystal White Shampoo

As a great stain remover wet the stained area, apply Crystal White Shampoo full strength, wrap lightly with plastic wrap and apply heat from dryer. This will activate the enzyme and helps to remove stains. To keep under eyes and faces clean, apply crystal white to a wet cloth and heat for 10 seconds in the microwave (if microwave is not available use warm water) wash the face and under eyes using wet cloth, no need to rinse.

Conditioner Cream Rinse

To help eliminate shedding and control static. After bathing apply Conditioner Cream rinse and leave on the coat for 5 minutes. Rake or comb out loose coat, rinse well.

Eau Der Gone

To eliminate smoke odors on pets, apply the Eau Der Gone to the pets coat and leave on for at least 5 minutes before bathing. This will remove the nicotine smell and leave the pet smelling fresh. This product may also be applied after rinse using it as a "leave on" odor destroyer.

The Answer

Mix 1oz. of the Answer to 15 oz of water in a spray bottle. Just before you begin drying mist lightly over coat. This will detangle the coat and help to make drying faster. Also leaves the coat silky without any heavy buildup.

Ear Magic

Ear magic is not only the perfect ear cleaner; it is also an amazing skin treatment. Ideal for use on hot spots and clipper burned areas. Apply using a tissue or cotton ball to the affected area. Ear magic is also excellent for removing tree-sap and gum from the pet's coat. Generally used before the bath.

Specifying Pet Shampoo - The Basics

D.J. Williams and Ellen Kominars EZ-Groom Corp., Oak Park, MI. U.S.A.

Dozens of new products have been formulated for a variety of positive outcomes, but which to select can be difficult. Coat type, condition, irritation, odor, oiliness, thickness of hair all influence the decision.

Bathing, often being the first step in the pet grooming process makes selection of the liquid products, shampoos, conditioners and other liquid products crucial in obtaining the desired results.

Experienced groomers select professional shampoos, as many of these products are consistent, high quality concentrated such to reduce both space needs and incoming freight cost.

Shampoo selection is often based on personal experience with professional products. Professional groomers are also aware of the differences between personal care shampoo and professional pet grooming shampoo. For example they are aware of the differences in the pH of pet and human skin is acidic in the range of 5.3-5.5, the pH of a dog's skin is much higher, much closer to neutral ranging from 6.7-7.4.

This article examines four primary topics that influence purchase decision. The first being coat type, structure and condition. Second, skin conditions which require not only cleansing the coat but also treating angry and irritated skin. Third coat enhancers which, post bathing, affect texture, color and manageability. Finally flea and tick issues with their associated skin conditions.

Pets do not specify shampoos, conditioners and other related products. People, specifically groomers, in a way similar to selection of products for their personal use, make the purchasing decision. Today's market is flooded with Shampoo

Formulations can overwhelm even the most up to date and knowledgeable groomer. The professional groomer is the best source of information and feedback when developing new formulations.

Fragrance, viscosity and foam are the three leading attributes that influence the decision. First the shampoo bottle is opened for fragrance check. If the fragrance is appealing chances are that the product is purchased. Once in the shower, the bottle is opened and the shampoo is poured into the hand. If the shampoo is thick and pours slowly it is perceived that the product is "Rich." When applied to the hair and the shampoo lathers quickly and profusely it is assumed that that the shampoo is effective. It is not uncommon for people to shampoo their hair twice since shampooing the first time does not result in the amount of foam they desire. While these attributes are important they do not contribute to the cleansing action desired from a shampoo.

Cleansing should not be confused with foaming. The most general definition of foam is a substance that is formed by trapping many gas bubbles in a liquid or solid. Foam is a distinctive attribute of shampoos. It is produced by introducing gas or air into the water and stabilized by surfactants, which adsorb at the newly formed interfaces. Adsorption is a process that occurs when a gas or liquid solute accumulates on the surface of a solid or a liquid (adsorbent), forming a film of molecules or atoms (the adsorbate). Foaming is important because it provides lubricity, needed for the groomer's fingers and tools to work their way through the coat allowing easier mechanical action through the hair. Formulators, who are aware of the consumer's perception and purchasing decisions, formulate products that have these attributes. It is not surprising that the groomer's perception of a "quality" pet shampoo is influenced by the, fragrance, feel and foaming action of the product. Experienced groomers, however, consider these three attributes but look beyond with a focus on the specific needs of the skin and coat. Along with cleansing, shampoos must not cause skin irritation.

The principal action of a shampoo is to remove soil consisting of sebum oil like material and trapped debris from the hair. Depending on the level of aggressiveness some shampoos may strip the hair of their natural oils and leave the hair dry and brittle. The groomer must then select a product, whether shampoo or conditioner that has refatting and moisturizing agents that will "put back" or replenish the coat's needed oils and moisture.

Shampoo 101

Owing to its consistency and adhesion, soil cannot be removed, for all practical purposes, from hair by mere mechanical work. The main role of shampoo is to loosen the physiochemical bonds between soil and hair and to carry them into a water medium. The term "surfactant" always comes up when talking about the physiochemical composition of shampoo. Interestingly, the word surfactant is much like the word Kleenex. Surfactant is short for "surface-active agent," and is an expired (turned to public domain in 1950 by GAF Corporation) trademark.

Surfactants have a dual affinity: they are both oil loving and water loving. This property originates from their molecular structure; they are made of a long so-called fatty hydrocarbon chain having a water soluble head. The principle that illustrates the function of surfactants or surface active agents is shown by the diagram of Micelle. Pronounced "my cell," the diagram illustrates basics of cleansing action. Each needle-looking object represents an amphipathic molecule. Amphipathic describes the coexistence of two normally opposed or different entities on a single platform. Examining the figure showing the micelle, one sees an arrangement composed of elements that resemble pins. Each pin or platform has a point and a head. The pinpoint is oil loving or lipophilic; and the head is water loving or hydrophilic. The oil side is attracted to oils and the water side is attracted to water. When there are many of these molecules in a water base the molecules align themselves in such a way that all the heads are in contact with the water while the tails are protected from the water. The simplest arrangement of this condition is a sphere where all the heads form the surface of the sphere, the tails being interior to the sphere. This model simplifies the visualization of the micelle showing that the interior of the sphere will trap oil molecules and let them be rinsed away.

Sebum, generated by the sebaceous glands, along with other oils with debris particulate that adhere to it, are surrounded by the oil loving center of the micelle. Once trapped inside the micelle, the oils (sebum and imbedded debris) are carried away in the rinse water. As a general and simple concept this is the cleansing process.

Surfactants are synthesized from a fatty base referred to as triglycerides which are derived either from animal or vegetable fats and oils. The constituents of triglycerides are a derivative of glycerol and an acid. The acids are therefore called "fatty acids". The fatty acids are used as ingredients in shampoo to provide conditioning to thicken and provide opacity and when neutralized to provide cleansing and foaming properties. Fatty acids are the material from which surfactants are produced.

Surfactants fall into four classes, Anionic, Cationic, Nonionic and Amphoteric. These divisions are not always well defined. Anionic surfactants are characterized by a negative charge on the "head" of the molecule (imagine the molecule looking like a pin with a head and a prickly point). Anionic surfactants have been the workhorse of cleansing agents ever since cleansing agents have been produced. There are many different types of Anionic surfactants since they are relatively simple to synthesize. Anionic surfactants are excellent foaming and cleansing agents partly because of the shape of the surfactant molecule.

Cationic surfactants have a positive charge on the head of the molecule. They possess two important qualities: they are substantive (are attracted and will attach themselves) to negatively charged surfaces and they have antimicrobial properties. Cationic surfactants do not have cleansing properties. Since hair is negatively charged they attach to hair shaft and provide conditioning. Because cationic surfactants have a positive charge they are usually not compatible with anionic based shampoos. The cationic molecules are attracted to the anionic molecules they combine with each other to form a neutral insoluble complex. Because of the antimicrobial properties of cationic surfactants they are used as preservatives, sanitizing and disinfecting agents. Many cationic surfactants incorporate an ammonium molecule and are known as quaternary compounds.

Nonionic surfactants, usually considered to be very mild, carry no charge in their molecule. They include a large number of compounds whose flexibility of design is their distinctive feature. They generally have good solubilizing and dispersing properties and can be tailored to meet cleansing requirements. Several types of nonionic surfactants are significant in shampoo formulations but as a general class they are not used as the principal ingredients. They are most often used as additives to the basic shampoo formulation. Nonionic surfactants are often not very hydrophilic and require another surfactants to solubilize them.

They are used in shampoo formulations as foam boosters, foam stabilizers and viscosity modifiers. By themselves nonionic surfactants are generally not very good cleansing and foaming agents and, except in special cases, cannot be used as the primary surfactants. Many shampoo formulations incorporate nonionic surfactants to create milder cleansing products.

Amphoteric surfactants contain both anionic and cationic solubilizing groups. The dominant feature depends on the pH of the medium. At acid (low) pH, the cationic group prevails and at alkaline (high) pH the anionic group prevails while at neutral pH or slightly below neutral pH the molecule is dipolar since it bears both positive and negative charges simultaneously. Amphoteric surfactants are used because they are very mild to the skin and eyes. They do not foam or clean as well their anionic relatives but are however ideal partners to powerful anionic cleansers in order to make them milder. The use of milder amphoteric surfactants is often recommended for mild shampoo formulations such as baby shampoo.

Shampoo appearance may be: clear liquids, opaque (pearlescent) liquids, gels, creams, foam, aerosol and pump. There are a multitude of shampoo types including conditioning, baby, color protecting, color enhancing and deodorizing.

In order to achieve the desired properties of shampoo most formulations consist of the following type of ingredients:

- Primary surfactant (cleanser)
- Secondary surfactant (foam booster/stabilizer)
- Thickener
- Opacifier (provides pearlescent appearance)
- Conditioners
- Performance additives
- Sequestering and chelating agents
- Preservatives
- Color
- Fragrance

The function of primary surfactants is to confer cleansing properties to the shampoo. Ingredients used most often as primary surfactants include alkyl sulfates and alkyl ether sulfates.

The most well known primary surfactants which are used in more than 80% of shampoo formulations are:

- Sodium Lauryl Sulfate (SLS)
- Ammonium Lauryl Sulfate (ALS)
- Sodium Lauryl Ether Sulfate Also known as Sodium Laureth Sulfate (SLES)
- Ammonium Lauryl Ether Sulfate also known as Ammonium Laureth Sulfate (ALES)

While these four surfactants are the most popular other surfactants such as alpha olefin sulphonates, sulphosuccinates, taurates and sarcosinates and others can be found in shampoo formulations.

The function of the secondary surfactant in a shampoo system is to stabilize the foam, enhance viscosity and also mitigate the irritancy of the primary cleansing surfactant. Secondary surfactants are often nonionic and amphoteric. The mechanism used to thicken shampoo formulation depends largely on the type of surfactants used. In shampoo systems where the primary surfactants are ALS, SLS or ALES and SLES viscosity enhancement is often achieved by using salts such as sodium chloride or ammonium chloride.

Opacity or pearlescence in a shampoo can enhance consumer appeal and can be provided by various materials. Most of which are waxy and crystalline in nature. The pearlescence obtained will depend on the size, shape distribution and reflectance of the opacifier crystals formed.

The use of conditioning agents in shampoo formulation is often a formulator challenge. Conditioning agents were not present in shampoo formulations until a decade or so ago. Most conditioning agents are cationic and tend to complex with the anionic surfactants and form an insoluble compound. The industry recognizing the need for conditioning shampoos has developed specialized cationic polymers and amino-functional silicones that will coexist with anionic surfactants.

Performance additives are normally incorporated into shampoos that are designed to accomplish special functions. Examples of such products are medicated, anti-dandruff, and anti itch shampoos. Active agents such as coal tar, sulfur, salicylic acid, selenium sulfide and zinc pyrithione. Incorporating and suspending these agents requires providing suspending properties to the shampoo formulation. For pet shampoo applications medicated shampoos incorporate other agents that are designed to treat skin diseases.

Just like humans, skin is the dog's largest organ. Unlike humans however pets are subjected to a large number of skin disorders. In today's market, where natural ingredients are desired, many botanical extracts have been formulated that provide performance enhancement to modern shampoos. Such botanical additives are sometimes referred to as "green" ingredients.

Sequestering and chelating agents are incorporated into shampoo systems to combat the effects of hard water, which normally results in poorer foam quality and dull appearance of the hair after shampooing. This is caused by removal of oil and precipitation of insoluble calcium salts on the surface of the hair. These salts often deposit a layer of scum on the hair which results in a dull appearance. The sequestering agents complex (combine in coordinate bond) with any metal ions in solution thereby removing their availability for precipitation on the hair.

Where does the oil come from?

Oil comes from sebaceous glands located beneath the surface of the skin. Sebaceous glands are located wherever there is hair on the dog. Just like humans, skin is the dog's largest organ.

The sebaceous glands appear as foamy lobes of epithelial cells that are attached to the mid-portion of the hair follicle through a short duct. Generally the sebum is secreted on the hair's shaft inside the follicles and is brought up to the surface of the skin along the hair shaft. Although these glands are attached to the hair follicles of every mammal, their function is controversial. Sebum lubricates and protects the hair and skin and prevents drying and irritation of membranes. Sebum coats and possibly enhances the barrier function of the outer layers of the skin. Sebaceous secretions while coating the hair shafts produce the sheen which makes the coat of a healthy dog or cat attractive. Sebum has the ability to waterproof the skin as evidenced in ducks which utilize secretions of a modified sebaceous gland to coat their feathers and keep them dry in water. Some of the sebum's fats keep bacteria from growing and it has been speculated that sebum plays a role in preventing bacterial infections. Sebum however, may collect excessively as a result of infrequent bathing, a diet rich in fats, or accelerated glandular activity. Excessive secretions of sebum may be related to skin disorders.

If sebum offers so many benefits, why remove it? Along with its many benefits, sebum is inherently tacky, creating a magnet for loose skin, airborne particulate, soil, urine, food and other loose debris. In addition to appearance issues, bacteria that breed in the sebum are the root cause of "doggie" odor. Cleansing action of the shampoo reduces, emulsifies and generally washes away these undesirable items. Aware of the importance of sebum for healthy skin and hair, it is clear that replenishing the skin with organic and natural substitute oils is needed. Some of these ingredients are known as refatting agents since they restore some of the natural oils on the hair shaft.

"Put back" is what we expect and get from conditioners

One of the desired functions of shampooing is to improve wet and dry combing after bathing. In order to accomplish this, conditioning agents are included in shampoo formulations. Improved brushability and combing offers a two-fold benefit. One, the easier the animal is to brush, the less time the groomer needs to spend with the pet. Secondly, the easier the brush or comb move through the coat, the less damage caused to the hair during grooming.

Hair strands have an inherently negative charge. They tend to repel one another, creating a "fly away" condition. Physics 101 tells us that like charges repel and unlike charges attract. Conditioner helps eliminate this condition by neutralizing the negative charge on the hair strands and adding needed oils and nutrient.

The following is a summary of the hair & coat condition issues to look, feel and smell for.

Dry coats are often worsened by over bathing and grooming. Dry, thin and over groomed hair is more susceptible to fly away. Unfortunately, nature works against a healthy coat. Healthy hair has a moisture range between 8-10%. Air, generally, has only 0.5-0.8% moisture. Since there is a large disparity between the moisture level of the ambient air and hair, moisture will tend to migrate out of the hair. It is necessary to infuse the hair with moisture retaining ingredients (humectants) that will impede the migration of moisture out of the hair. Moisture is an important element in a healthy coat since it maintains the volume, flexibility and manageability of the coat. Indoor air conditioning and forced dry heat exacerbate this differential. The lack of moisture, plus a lack of the waxy sebum which keeps moisture locked into the hair shaft, create the perfect conditions for dry, unsightly coat. Dry hair shows up as fly away strands and a dull coat.

There are a number of conditioning and finishing products that can remedy the dry condition. The first step is to rehydrate the coat by using water and humectant based formulas. A humectant is a hygroscopic substance. (Hygroscopy is the ability of a substance to attract water molecules from the surrounding environment through either absorption or adsorption).

In other words, water from the air -- natural humidity -- is attracted to the coat and ends up inside the cortex of the hair shaft.

Greasy Coats

Greasy hair results from a build-up of the natural secretion of sebum. Sebum is not absorbed into the shaft. The touch and look of hair depends on the amount of waxy sebum present. The glands secrete the same amount of wax regardless of the length of the hair. Therefore, short hair with less surface area than long hair tends to be greasier. Infrequent shampooing will cause grease and debris to accumulate. Eventually, strands will begin to adhere to one another and form clumps. Such clumps, left unattended, join neighboring clumps to form "super clumps." Degreasers solve this problem. Dematting and detangling products may also be needed before the bath. Degreasing shampoos, while they clean well, they tend to quickly strip the coat of sebum and other natural oils. For this reason, it is generally recommended to follow a degreasing shampoo with a conditioner.

Strong odors

There are two primary sources of odor: biological excretions and odor causing bacteria. The former applies to urine, feces, and other such excretions. The latter applies to bacteria that feed on organic matter breaking down the proteinaceous material and generating mal odor in the process. This breakdown process generates odors more distinctive than excretions. With the exception of skunk spray, excretions are easier to remove. Different additives enable shampoo formulations to focus on excretions and bacteria.

The primary carriers that enable the adsorption process are physisorption and chemisorption. In physisorption, the attraction is so great, different, yet similar to the micelle cleansing action, that the cell walls are penetrated. With chemisorption an actual bonding, is made prior to being carried away. Antimicrobial additives are included in some formulations to prevent the breakdown of proteinaceous matter by bacteria that results in mal odor. These additives use an electro-chemical action to penetrate and disrupt cell walls of micro-organisms. The fragrance industry having faced many odor issues have developed, in the last few years, ingredients that tend to neutralize offensive odors. These ingredients while neutralizing mal odors are capable of supporting pleasant odors. Not only do they leave the hair free of offensive odors they impart a pleasant fragrance to it. Odor removal, like suds or foaming, is separate from cleansing. Strong surfactants are not the key to odor removal. Oxidation and reduction agents are the major factors in removing odors. Antimicrobial additives include Triclosan and benzalkonium chloride.

Dull color is counteracted with special shampoos that feature optical whiteners or optical brighteners. White coats can be made brighter. Black coats can be made to appear darker and richer. Multicolor coats can also be enhanced and their color contrast improved.

Thin hair needs shampoo formulations with bodifying agents. Thin hair is often too soft to manage and stay in place. Bodifying ingredients add texture by leaving small deposits on the cuticle, allowing for added rigidity. Bodifying shampoos are formulated to give the coat the appearance of fullness. This can be accomplished in several ways. By infusing the hair shaft with water each hair shaft swells and appears wider and the multitude of hair gives fullness to the coat. Certain polymers are film-formers and deposit a film on the hair shaft. The film allows the hair to be spaced further apart to give an impression of fullness.

Colloidal Oatmeal Shampoo Therapy has been proven to have positive clinical outcomes on a number of skin conditions. Industry experts speculate that as much as 20% of dogs and cats have allergy induced skin problems. Skin diseases can be treated by diet and special use shampoos. Such shampoos have active ingredients that alleviate inflammation, calm, soothe (analgesic), and reduce microbial and fungal activity. These shampoo formulations are often referred to as "medicated" shampoos.

Chlorhexidine Gluconate, Miconazole, and Benzoyl Peroxide are some of the active antimicrobials in medicated shampoos. Alternative, natural ingredients such as Melaleuca Alternifolia (Tea Tree Oil) is also an effective antiseptic and anti fungal ingredient. Other natural ingredients include Sulfur, Coal Tar, Oatmeal, Meadowsweet, and Comfrey, Salicylic acid, Lavender, Chamomile, Yucca, Aloe Vera, Vitamin E and host of other additives.

Professional pet groomers, working predominantly with concentrated formulations need to first ensure the shampoo is being diluted to label instructions. Sulfur, is known to alleviate various conditions such as psoriasis and eczema. Zinc pyrithione has anti fungal and antibacterial properties that aid in the treatment of dry flaking skin (dandruff in human cosmetics).

Coal Tar is anti seborrheic anti dandruff agent. Coal tar will reduce the production of skin cells and treat skin disease and dandruff. Coal Tar for relief of flaking generally has a discernible odor that is objectionable to some groomer.

Oil of Wintergreen, a natural analgesic and anti-inflammatory is readily absorbed by the skin, and is very warm and soothing. Oil of Wintergreen is a naturally derived methyl salicylate. It is a substance that is related to Aspirin (Acetyl Salicylic Acid).

Chamomile is used in ear ointments and used to calm and relax. Popular designer herbal teas include Chamomile. Oatmeal is the most popular additive for soothing and healing of the coat with acknowledgement of its anti-itch properties.

An important topic deserved of additional reading relates to fleas. Many insecticidal ingredients used in shampoos have been banned by the EPA. Toxicity leads the list of concerns on products of this type. Primarily to due complex chemicals that may accumulate in the groomers body. Botanical ingredients, which the body can process in shorter order should be welcomed. Such botanical ingredients include Derus Root, Orange Oil, Cedar Wood oil and Oil of Wintergreen.

The cost of shampoo per groom.

While shampoo cost is quite high, the actual cost per bath is relatively low. One must pay attention to concentration ratios. For example, a single gallon 16:1 dilution shampoo will bath twice as many dogs as a product with a lower, 8:1 ratio. For example, if two shampoos were being considered, each with a price of $20.00 per gallon, the cost per diluted gallon of the lower ratio 8:1 becomes twice as high as the 16:1. Specifically, the diluted 8:1 works out to $2.50 per gallon, while the 16:1 ratio becomes only $1.25 per gallon.

If one were to arbitrarily assign a nominal 12.8 ounces of diluted shampoo for a bath the cost of shampoo per that then would be 12.5 cents for the 16:1 and 25 cent for the lower concentrate 8:1 shampoo. It is clear that one of the smallest costs of the grooming process is the shampoo. For this reason, high quality products that are suited to the pet's specific requirements should be specified on a case-by-case basis.

How spending more money reduces overall costs

With the understanding that the cost of shampoo per bath is measured in pennies, not dollars, it follows that conditioner, dematting and fast blow drying products, which are universally available from most manufacturers, add the same cost (about 15 to 30 cents) per groom.

An upcoming article will examine how groomers can spend 20 cents to save 20 minutes. (See page 18)
